Before the start of the season and even before you play any games, the hockey team needs to train a lot. They practice target shots; They practice passing; they only practice ice skating. But, one key thing in practice is actually playing the game. Each sports team plays at least one pre-season game, an exhibition game. And JLPT is very similar to a sports game. It's practically a Japanese Olympics language if you like that analogy. It is important to at least run through events or test sections at least once before the real thing. Otherwise you may end up getting lost somewhere along the way. Some might want to take a natural approach just by going into the test or finding it silly to walk through it all before going in. Test only twice a year, or if you are outside Asia only once a year. So if you don't you have to wait a full year to take it again. Why not spend extra time to make sure you're ready to go to the main event? This article is about the JLPT N5 test, but if you are studying any other level of the exam, I have the JLPT N4 Practical Test, the JLPT N3 Practical Test, the JLPT N2 Practical Test, and the JLPT N1 Practice Test available, too. By taking the JLPT N5 Practice TestSo, how can you take this test? Well, now there's a full-size mock test available that you can take that follows the new format. In 2010, they made several changes to the test format. If you take the old version of the test, you can still use them, but there are some small differences between the old and the new ones. However, the listening and grammar sections are quite different. Past tests are still good practice, but keep in mind how they differ from the new test. There is another solution to this problem though. JEES (Japanese Education and Exchange Services) have made the JLPT sample test available.
